Vulnerability is not a mistake but the fundamental nature of human beings. However, the society usually portrays power and self, restraint as the most desirable qualities, thus, individuals have to conceal the characteristics that bind them and make them similar.

Vulnerability is a relative concept, one person's safety may be another person's danger. Suppose for a person who has problem of ADHD and always talks while doing anything, that person would feel vulnerable in social gathering and outside world, but would feel comfortable, completely different in between his/her/its people, where they accept what the person is, like suppose colleague who has same problem or knows how to adjust and be normal about it.

The point is that which section of society sees some characteristics as ability or disability, to what extent, at what time, and benefit-to-loss tradeoffs associated to it. Suppose, inside military; a person who is not physically fit for ground fights due to leg disability but great at analytical skill and strategies, would be a burden for the ground team, but the same person would be great assets for the strategic decision making team.

When viewed structurally, vulnerability becomes even more complex. If all of them are "wicked problems," they offer no final solution, only ongoing negotiation, deeper understanding, and sustained compassion

So, structurally looking at it, vulnerability is far more complicated and it keeps going down in a spiral. If each of them is a "wicked problem," then they don't provide a final solution, but only continuous negotiation, deeper understanding, and continued compassion.

Or we can say that the person whom do we share our deep vulnerabilities with no justification or fear of judgement, those people sometime control us at time of peak need or unforeseen circumstances. I think we can't really stand or make our point or fight for it equally to that person who helped in our desperate times because that person knows how vulnerable we are or how low we think of ourselves, even the other person wouldn't think that ,but our overthinking make chaos.

If the person is into relationship and accepts the good characteristics and really care that, then i feel that accepting the bad characteristics is too part of relationship, not in pursuit of correcting each other. So that person could be free in his/her/its group, else everyone is diplomatic persona mannered in outside world.

Identifying vulnerability thus constitutes a political gesture. It confronts the myth of total independence and reveals the extent to which people depend on each other.

Allowing oneself to be vulnerable is an invitation to compassion, justice, and genuine relationship, it enables Society is not less strong, rather, it becomes more human.
